Reflections from the Dean, Faculty of Education, Brock University

Michael Manley-Casimir

The opportunity to contribute an editorial to the founding issue of Teaching and Learning is a privilege and I would like to begin by commending Dr. Ray Chodzinski, Associate Dean, Hamilton Campus for his vision, his energy and initiative in bringing this publication to fruition. The topic is acutely appropriate at this time in Ontario with the provincial government's decision to impose its teacher testing initiative on the teachers of the province.

Suffice it to note that the widespread opposition to the three pronged initiative is not at all surprising: The Entry to the Profession Test, the proposed Recertification process and the Performance Assessment component combine to undermine the role of provisionally accredited Faculties of Education to establish and maintain appropriate standards of public and professional accountability, to reduce if not vitiate the role of the Ontario College of Teachers as a professional development of teachers, and to require and fund school boards to institute a first year, probationary induction program for beginning teachers, perhaps in collaboration with Faculties of Education, followed by a more stringent and rigorous performance appraisal process conducted by building principals and consistent with the principles of natural justice.

Such initiatives would have appropriately protected the public interest in publically funded education, charged the Ontario College of Teachers with responsibilities appropriate to its mandate and placed the responsibility for the induction and performance appraisal of beginning teachers where it correctly belongs—with the school boards and building principals.

It is really quite tragic to watch poor educational policy being forced down the throats of talented and committed teachers in Ontario. If politicians in Queen’s Park had spent any time at all in schools working with classroom teachers, listening to their concerns, appreciating the endless hours of their personal time they commit to working with children and young people, they might have been more aware of the real issues facing teachers in the classroom. Over the past two decades the task of teaching has become increasingly demanding as the school has assumed the roles historically played by churches, social agencies, and to some extent by families themselves. Expected to prepare young people to function effectively in the next economy and build useful and productive lives, teach the intellectual and vocational understandings necessary for such endeavors, teachers need support in developing a truly professional status in this province. Instead they are systematically demoralized by the continuing attacks by government on their competence and commitment. What teachers need is help and assistance to do better the job they already do well—to work with the young people of Ontario in building a future for all.

Instead of initiating a Teacher Testing Initiative that demoralizes and deprofessionalizes teachers and teaching, I hope the next Minister of Education will start supporting teachers by appreciating the real work they really do and putting in place sensible educational policies designed to assure teachers of government support and the public that teachers are not here to be shellacked and abused but supported and respected.
